Ethics as a daily practice

By Julian Dean

I assumed that this book would be about ethics: Ethics in business and government, and all the related struggles our society is having in these times. As I began to read, however, the power of the stories swept me away. Rather than being ABOUT ethics, the book brings me deeply into the hearts and minds of people, famous and common, and takes me into the heart of ethics... Ethics as a practice in the seemingly small moments of my daily life. It has caused me to rearrange how I make momentary choices with my own personal and professional behavior. While reading the book (I moved through it with a deliberate slowness, reading each story like a daily meditation), I began to listen more carefully to my inner dialogues and drives as the events of the day would unfold. I found myself beginning to practice a new kind of ethical behavior in the normal goings-on around the office and out in the field where I teach. Jim Lichtman has created a moving, breathing, calling with this book. It has an uncanny and powerful presence that reminds me what I can do, in any given moment, to behave gracefully. For this book, I am enormously grateful.

Moments of Grace

By Stanley D. Williams, PhD

In my research and writing about movies that are box office successes, I've discovered that they all have one thing in common: a true Moral Premise. The Moral Premise describes the physical and psychological arc of a story's flawed protagonist who faces a moral dilemma. The moment in the movie when the protagonist makes the choice between a destructive vice and a liberating virtue is called the Moment of Grace. In "What Do You Stand For?" Jim Lichtman relays a hundred fabulous short stories in the words of the famous and not-so-famous who lived the drama of real-life dilemmas, and made successful choices in real-life Moments of Grace. The sub-title of Lichtman's book perfectly articulates why the people in his book and a select number of movies are so successful -- they both tell "Stories about principles that matter." We gravitate to stories that tell the truth because we want to know how to better live our lives. "What Do You Stand For?" is a mother-load of real-life examples of how we, as protagonists of our own stories, can be a box-office success in life. This is a great book that should be required reading for all.

Living right in a dangerous time

By John N. Baldwin MD

I have to confess that I contributed to this book, but among the Dalai Lama, Arnold Palmer and the likes of Mario Cuomo, I am the least among the one-hundred or so who wrote aspects of their lives which had made a difference. I was privileged to serve the US soldier in Viet Nam as a fully-trained cardiac-vascular-general surgeon, and in that year saw more, learned more and saved more lives than in my 40 year-career. This book stands out as a singular beacon in today's world of failed sports stars, tarnished executives, fallen ministers and dishonored presidents as a simple guide to taking the often difficult path...honesty and virtue, which in the end, will avoid the pitfalls of deceit which, inevitably, lead to failure. Some of the contributors are just "ordinary" people but their take on major life decisions are overwhelmingly insightful and add great value to anyone reading this well-conceived anthology.
